Losh Mausoleum

The mausoleum is a primitive-looking, flat-roofed building constructed from large roughly hewn blocks of stone with a copper-covered oak door. Inside there is a seated marble figure of Katherine, taken from a sketch which Sara made when the sisters were in Naples in 1817, and carved by a local sculptor, David Dunbar.

Architect(s)
Sara Losh

Listing
Grade II (England and Wales)

Year Created
1835

History
The Loshes were an old Cumbrian family who belonged to a free-thinking circle of lawyers, manufacturers and public servants. Sara Losh (1785-1853) and her sister Katherine grew up at the family home of Woodside in Wray where Wordsworth and Southey were occasional visitors. Sara was very clever; a fine linguist (she spoke fluent French and Italian besides reading Greek and Latin), a great lover of art and architecture and an exceptionally gifted designer in her own right. Neither she nor Katherine ever married, and when the latter died in 1835 Sara was said to be ‘almost inconsolable’. Besides building the mausoleum in memory of her sister, she designed the church, memorial obelisk and mortuary chapel at Wray. One of the most striking things about the decoration of her buildings is the combination of fossil forms with Egyptian, Christian and Jewish motifs; another is the way in which the bold stylization of the carving prefigures that of the Arts and Crafts Movement some fifty years later.

Condition
Good (2001).

Sources
BoE: Cumberland and Westmorland (1967), 210-3;
Country Life, 4 November 1971, 1231;
Location
Churchyard of St Mary,
Wreay,
Cumbria.
CA4 0RJ